Bugs Bunny's giant carrot crop

"What have you got for me today, Mac?" asked Bugs Bunny. The mailman was turning in at his walk, running an experienced finger through his pack of mail.

"This is the works, Bugs," said the mailman, handing over a thick book in a brown wrapper.

"Thanks, Mac," said Bugs. He ripped off the wrappings and read the title—" 'Colossal Seed Company—Spring Catalogue.' Hmm, hmm!"

"Huh? Seeds?" he murmured. "No, thanks, kids. Yer old friend, B. Bunny, is heading for the big time this year. I'm sinking my all in Stupenderosa Gianticas."

"St-t-tu-whats?" asked Porky.

"Wait and see, doc! Wait and see!" said Bugs with a lordly wave of his hand. He sank back in the canvas lawn chair with a happy, dreamy smile on his face.

It was not long before Porky and Petunia were back to see what they could see. At least it did not seem long to Bugs. But this time they had to peek through a knothole in a high board fence. On the fence was a big sign which said in fierce block letters: KEEP OUT! STUPENDEROSA GIANTICA EXPERIMENTAL STATION—B. BUNNY, PROP.

"G-Gosh! Look at the s-size of those c-carrot greens!" gasped Porky.

"They're almost as tall as the fence!" Petunia marveled.

Next time they came, the feathery greens were waving above the top of the fence. But there had been other changes, too. There were great cracks in the ground which had broken the fence apart. It was fastened together with wicked-looking barbed wire. But they could see past the twisted wire into the garden, where the huge round tops of giant orange carrots were forcing their way up through the cracked earth.

"G-Golly, what c-carrots!" said Porky, with a whistle of amazement.

"Yes, I suppose so," said a tired voice behind them. They turned to see an exhausted Bugs Bunny wrapped in bandages, hobbling up on two canes. There were red rims around his tired eyes.

"Why, Bugs!" cried Petunia. "Whatever is the matter?"

"Oh, it's nothing, doc—er, Petunia," sighed Bugs. "Nothing but just my supercolossal, gigantic carrots, that is. They've grown so darned big they just caved in my rabbit hole, is all. Just squashed in the walls of my dear old childhood home right on top of me, is all. And they caved in Farmer Jones's well next door. He's suing me. And a couple of his prize pigs fell into a crack in the ground and I have to pay for them. But there's nothing wrong, folks. Everything's terrific—just terrific!" And Bugs laughed a hollow, bitter laugh.

"Why, that's a shame, Bugs!" said Petunia. "But they certainly are amazing carrots. They'll make your fortune, I know. Why, it almost seems as if you can see them grow!"

They all turned to look at the garden, and, sure enough, the giant carrots did seem to be popping right out of the ground as they watched.

In fact, they were!

"Look out, folks! Duck! They're going up!" cried Bugs.

The three friends flung themselves flat on the ground as, with a great rending roar, the giant carrots exploded!

Slowly the clouds of dust settled. Bugs Bunny groaned and tried to pull himself to his feet. He seemed to be trapped. When at last he wrenched himself free, he found it was the splintered wreckage of his canvas lawn chair that had trapped him. He shook his head and looked around to view the wreckage.

There was none. There was not a sign of Porky or Petunia. Behind Bugs his rabbit hole opened, with the ladder peeping up over the edge as usual. Ahead of him the path stretched away to his weed-grown garden plot. Nothing was changed. And beside him on the ground lay a bright-colored catalogue opened to a picture of a huge yellow carrot.

"Ugh!" groaned Bugs. "Take it away! What a dream! I'm off of carrots for life!"

And he was—at least, until the first little feathery greens began to show in Porky's and Petunia's garden plot.
